

Flow Results introduces a surgeon comparison tool built around public sources and consultation questions

San José, Costa Rica, September 14, 2026. Flow Results introduces a new version of its Surgeon Comparison Agent. The tool organizes public information about two doctors, distinguishes registry information from published claims, and prepares questions patients can take to their consultations.

The initial DeepSeek workflow is being validated for plastic surgeons in Mexico City and tummy tuck procedure context. Other locations, specialties and procedures require further validation or assisted review. There is no guaranteed turnaround time or page count.

Users enter two doctors' names, their procedure and contact details at <https://agente.flowresults.com/comparador/>. The system uses the same search limits for both doctors. DeepSeek extracts facts and checks them against source passages; code validates citations and assembles the report. Cases that fail checks require review before delivery.

The report identifies public CMCPER specialty registry entries, published training and professional background, accessible profile reviews and questions about the surgical setting, follow-up and written quotes. It does not independently validate professional licenses, read every online review, or certify that no complaints exist. A consultation price is not presented as the price of surgery.

The report is informational. It does not recommend or clinically rank surgeons. Public visibility does not establish clinical quality. No physician pays to appear or to receive a better assessment.

The service is offered at no charge to users during September, subject to capacity and quality checks. Patients' names and email addresses are not sent to DeepSeek or Firecrawl for physician research. Personal reports are not published in the press room.
